To fhb,

In view of HK's dense population and land prices allowing columbarium places to be placed around residential areas will cause stress to residents (since Chinese people feel a taboo around these places). It will also lower the price of housing around those areas. In my opinion and as a long term view to this problem the government should consider and choose one outer island (there are so many unused and deserted islands in HK) start developing one full island for this purpose. I can imagine an island like a place of worship like a well planned small town with both public (80%) and private (20%) columbarium running and with temples and churches available. Small housing for employees who need to work there and maybe some small shops for incense or daily living materials. New boating service lines. Imagine how many new jobs you can create with this idea. This ancestral island as I may call it may even turn out to be a tourist attraction for foreigners!

just a brainstorm
